

The Effects of and the Recovery from Forest Grazing

Adam J. Kurczek

Field Botany and Ecology

Dr. Mike Baranski, Instructor

Ms. Sarah Wike, Assistant

Summer Ventures in Science and Mathematics

The University of North Carolina at Charlotte

Abstract

Through the use of the Shannon diversity index, this study was conducted to determine if there was any difference between woods that had once been grazed by animals or not. The study was conducted in Julian Price Park in Watauga County, North Carolina. Through the study's results, it is proven that woods that have once been grazed are less diverse than ungrazed woods.